Long-Serving Former Xavier President Says HBCUs Face 'Tough Decade'

By Autumn A. Amett

Dr. Norman Francis concluded his 47-year career as president of Xavier University in Louisiana last month — making him the longest-serving HBCU president and one of the longest-serving presidents of any U.S. institution. On his way out the door, the man who could be seen as a godfather of HBCUs reflected on the state of the institutions and the path ahead, which he said looks bleak in many ways.

The state of HBCUs 'has changed, as you can imagine, measurably since I have been president of Xavier [and it has been] changing rapidly in the last decade,' said Francis in a recent interview. And he foresees "another tough decade" ahead.

Part of the problem, said Francis, is the need to constantly defend and assert the value of the institutions - and the other group of institutions is ever asked to do on a collective scale.

"We are facing the traditional perception that all Black colleges are going to go out of business, or they should go out of business. That is foolish," Francis said. "We who operate in the inner city, the public institutions, are being asked to do a major job to continue to do [in educating Black students] as we've done for the 100 past years."

When I look at the future, it's going to be a future that will demand strong leadership from boards, from faculty and from staff; the same dedication in terms of commitment to students that we've always had, we're going to have to have more of that, because not all of the students that I'm talking about are going to get the beneficiary of having a quality high school education. Some will, and we have students who can go anywhere they want to go who are coming to HBCUs, but there are some who need us and that has been true over the years; he added.

But recent actions and proposals on the federal level will work toward the ability of the institutions as a whole, he said. "The country itself and the federal government have gone through sequestration, cutting the budget, and many programs — and more than I thought two, three years ago — that were targeted for minority institutions, we got hit harder than most schools by cuts mandated by the Congress. We fought hard and we have maintained some degree of protecting what we have fought hard to keep since the 60s almost," said Francis.

Not only has federal policy made a difference, but rapidly increasing state cuts are also affecting HBCUs in major ways, said Francis. The public institutions have been faced with some of the same problems that private schools have been faced with — namely, the ability to get the amount of dollars from the state in order to be effective in running a quality and competitive educational program; he said, "That is the biggest problem that we have seen in states across the South in recent years. Budgets have been cut across the board in all of the quality-of-life issues and education has been particularly impacted by that."

These challenges trickle down to impact the students whom HBCUs traditionally serve; he said, "Students have been of course affected because institutions have not been given the resources to provide the tools that might have been needed to bridge the gap between federal and state aid and what families have been able to put of their own resources!"

For this reason, he said, HBCU leadership must pay careful attention to and become fervent advocates for increased Title III and Title IV funding.

"Title III and Title IV — those two are sides of the same coin," said Francis. "We need to have more federal aid to help students to attend whatever schools they are going to attend, and we need to have more funds... to maintain the institutions' health."

The bottom line, he said, is that "paying for college attendance in the last 10 years... has been a major problem, and what it has done is it has cut our enrollments down more than we would have ever expected them to do, and that's still true today, and it has impacted our ability to recruit students."

Francis acknowledges that the issue of college affordability is not unique to families of students attending HBCUs. "Black college problem, it is a problem with America as a whole and all of higher education," he said, "where families who were once middle-class families and felt like we can handle our education of our children are now struggling to do so. He also said, through, that Black colleges are being hit the hardest because they have traditionally labored to do more with less.

For their part, there are three major actions that HBCUs have to do to make sure they are able to endure the tough times ahead, Francis said. First, they will need to assert and maintain a strong institutional brand, which includes the development of partnerships, both domestically and abroad, and continue to evaluate the strength of programs offered — particularly in STEM fields.

Another key, he said, is keeping in touch with alumni and knowing what they are doing postgraduation, which would help with maintaining the strength of the institutions' programs.

All in all, Francis said HBCU leaders know they are "not looking for some rose garden" of circumstances that will favor the institutions. As he notes, it will take strong leaders at every level to guide the schools through the network of challenges they will be facing in increasing federal aid to help students attend whatever schools they are going to attend, and we need to have more funds... to maintain the institutions' health."

When a school faces the loss of accreditation, it has a few options, says Francis, but he recommends trying to meet the accrediting commission's standards. Failing that, it can appeal to politicians, work to garner popular public support, or see if a different accreditor. Once all those options have been exhausted, there are few alternatives other than to fold or be submerged by a different institution.

There are a number of high-profile accreditation crises across the nation this moment. One notable example is in California, where the City College of San Francisco (CCSF) has been locked in a battle of wills with the Accrediting Commission for Community and Junior Colleges (ACCJC).

The ACCJC threatened to remove the school's accreditation in 2012, sparking an ongoing legal battle.

Although CCSF's plight has garnered close media attention and advocacy on the college's behalf from community organizers and state politicians alike, it should be noted that, generally speaking, commissions are slow to sanction schools. Martin Himwich, former director and general counsel for the American Association of Collegiate Registrars and Accrediting (AACRAO), said that ACCJC has sanctioned a disproportionate number of schools compared to other accreditors.

A recent Wall Street Journal report compared the graduation and student-loan default rates of colleges that lost accreditation in 2000 to more than 1,500 currently accredited four-year colleges. The report found that nearly 350 of those schools have worse graduation and default rates now than the comparison group of schools that lost accreditation in 2000.

As the JPS report would indicate, with the exception of how the accreditation commissions are more frequently criticized for failing to act than for being overly punitive. When the Corinthian College system collapsed last year, they assumed a whole different climate for HBCUs in the American higher education landscape. IJ

For the sake of those who still care to pursue education and care to keep schools open, the question remains. What will happen when institutions are unable to keep afloat and the financial viability of those schools is threatened?

BCCCs in Good Standing While Sojourner-Douglass Loses Accreditation

By Catherine Morris

Baltimore City Community College (BCCC) was placed on warning by the Middle States Commission on Higher Education (MSCHE) in 2014, but was able to show this year that it is once again in compliance with all 14 of the conditions on its standards. MSCHE removed the college's warning and reaffirmed its accreditation on June 25.

"The affirmation of accreditation means that the future is bright for BCCC," said BCCC President Gordon F. May in an email. "The school had run into accreditation issues in the past — in 2011 the school was put on probation for issues with student-learning evaluations and received a warning in 2004. When a school is put on warning or its accreditation status is threatened, it often has the effect of scaring away students. At CCSF, faculty say that when the ACCJC threatened to revoke the school's accreditation, many students dropped out because they believed the school was going to shut down."

CCSF has now until 2017 to comply with ACCJC standards but during the years its fate hung in the balance, some faculty say that they personally wondered if the school would close and that they would have to rebuild it – to reassure them that the school would stay open and that they would have an institution to return to.

May said that the warning status made recruiting students to the college more difficult, but that the school continued to enroll students in line with other Maryland community colleges even when BCCC was on warning. BCCC enrolled on average about 18,000 students a year.

May said that recruiting students will be one of the school's priorities going forward, and noted that the school created new degrees and certificates for in-demand areas such as cybersecurity, para medicine and artistry science.

BCCC's story is a happy one, but another local Baltimore institution, Sojourner-Douglass College (SDC), was notified on June 30, MSCHE said earlier in the year that Sojourner-Douglass lacked the required financial resources to continue after this academic year. The fate of Sojourner-Douglass's students and buildings remains unclear, although the school filed a lawsuit against MSCHE on June 29 through the U.S. Court of Appeals.

A MSCHE representative said in an email that the commission could not comment on the situation due to pending legal action.

According to The Baltimore Sun, Sojourner-Douglass enrolled 750 students as of May, The Sun reported that Stratford University, a for-profit institution based in Virginia, and Sojourner-Douglass had a memorandum of understanding. According to the agreement, Sojourner-Douglass would become a part of the Stratford system. Stratford would create the Sojourner-Douglass Center, offering courses in nursing, health sciences, nursing and education.
